Customer Reviews

As great of a resource as the Internet can sometimes be, there is still nothing like personally owning and browsing through a single, authoritative, well-organized, tangible compendium of essential information about our world. It is easy to get lost in all the information on the Internet, but browsing through the "World Almanac" can be an enjoyable, educational, linear-path "guided tour" through much of the most important and relevant information about many aspects of the world. The "New York Times" and "Time with Information Please" almanacs have ceased publication in recent years, so it is good that the "World Almanac" is still going strong. Its only major remaining competitor is the "Time Powered by Britannica". The "World Almanac" is clearly the better of the two, as it has color photo plates for the year in review, is more up-to-date, is 144 pages longer, and, most importantly, makes much better use of space. For example, "Time's" listings of the nations of the world covers 297 pages, while the "World Almanac's" covers only 107, even though the "World's" is arguably more comprehensive. Similarly, both have essentially the same coverage of Olympics, but the "Time" takes 68 pages to do it while the "World Almanac" takes 25. Thus, there is much more total information in the "World Almanac." Nevertheless, there are some good things in the "Time" not in the "World" (such as more detailed information about state governments; listings of Fields Medal, National Medal of Science, and National Medal of Arts winners; tables of nutritional values of foods; and listings of great symphonies and opera companies of the world along with their directors), so, if you like almanacs, I would still recommend getting both.
